LJWL MEMORIES

One of my favorite funny memories in the LJWL department happened this semester when I was working with one of my students in the Writers' Studio. I was helping him write an argumentative essay on whether a hotdog is a sandwich. Rachel Grace, Jaden, and Brennan joined in the conversation and it turned into a big five-way debate. We defined bread, fillings, and the orientation that would constitute a sandwich. We filled up the white board in the studio with philosophical terms that define an objects state of being, and a poll asking everyone the the LJWL department to vote on what they believe, and to state their argument to support their claim. It was funny, engaging, and the student wrote a really solid outline of his essay.

WHAT'S NEXT

After graduation I plan on getting a job in publication. Most publication companies are in New York, Boston, and San Francisco, but I am planning on going wherever the wind takes me. And of course, I will continue to write.

HOPE FOR THE FUTURE

In the future I hope to travel and take inspiration from everything I see and everyone I meet. I want to continue to publish my books, and help other people write their stories. My specific goals are to eventually finish my stack of unread books (537 upon last count), get a really fancy espresso machine, and have a home with a big backyard for a dog. Overall, I am hopeful that my future will have more smiles than anything else.
